

EAST ASIAN MEDICAL DIAGNOSIS

For two thousand years, diagnosis in East Asian medicine has asked one central question: not just what disease is this, but what pattern is this — read through pulse, tongue, complexion, and the patient's own account, held together as one picture.

That question has been handed down practitioner to practitioner for two millennia, refined and argued over and rewritten by hand, long before it reached you. You're not just learning it. You're the newest link in a chain that long — and soon enough, it's your hands on someone's wrist, not just your eyes on a page.

普同一等，皆如至親

"When someone comes seeking help, do not ask if they are noble or common, rich or poor — treat every patient alike, as if they were your own family."
